this dissertation is about the acquisition of presupposition the specific focus is on the interplay between presuppositional content as hardwired in the semantics of particular expressions and the conversational contexts in which utterances containing those expressions may be used a series of behavioral experiments examine what children in the preschool age range know about the pragmatic principles governing presupposition and how they come to acquire this knowledge the dissertation is organized into two thematic halves the first half investigates the conditions that govern when presupposing something is appropriate hence allow for the use of a presupposition triggering expression specifically i ask do young children know the common ground requirement the formal requirement that presuppositions be previously established common knowledge and do they know when and how this requirement can be violated two sets of experiments using two presupposition carrying expressions with importantly divergent properties too and the reveal that children like adults generate a default expectation that a presuppositional sentence be uttered to a listener who already takes for granted the presupposition however they hold onto this expectation even in circumstances where adult speakers do not unlike adults children do not expect that an otherwise neutral listener might accommodate a speaker s informative presupposition together these findings point to a developmental path where the formal requirement that presuppositions be presuppositions is acquired before an understanding that the rule can be bent and how the second half examines the conditions that make marking of presuppositions obligatory hence require the use of a presupposition triggering expression are children sensitive to maximize presupposition heim 1991 as a principle governing competition and utterance choice the ability to deploy maximize presupposition in an adult like way shows a more protracted developmental trajectory moreover children s ability to rule out presuppositionally weaker sentences seems to vary across competition environments taking the non uniformity in development as signaling non uniformity in the underlying phenomena i develop an alternative account for a pair of expressions commonly thought to compete for maximize presupposition another vs a ultimately i suggest that maximize presupposition is one of several pragmatic principles that lead to competition and selection of structures imposing the strongest contextual requirement children have command of some of these conditions but not others the acquisition trajectories are modulated by various factors including the type of requirement imposed on the context e g that some proposition is salient vs accepted common belief and the types of knowledge that are pre requisites e g knowledge of idiosyncratic properties of the lexicon

this work presents a procedural account of the so called projection problem for presupposition it is assumed that presuppositions embedded in complex sentences are subject to no projection rules or ad hoc conditions whatever but are in fact satisfied in appropriate contexts in a completely uniform way it is demonstrated that the apparent filtering alteration or preservation of an embedded presupposition is in every case a logical consequence of a general independently motivated model of language processing and knowledge representation it is shown in detail that turning the projection problem upside down in this way leads to a far more explanatory and descriptively adequate account than any previously proposed
